

The Lyceum Case

Case Name: The Lyceum v. City of South Euclid, Ohio

Case Status: On April 3, ADF attorneys filed a federal lawsuit on behalf of The Lyceum, challenging an ordinance in the city of South Euclid, Ohio.

Significance: Whether the government can force a religious school to violate its deeply held religious beliefs in employment and enrollment practices.

Background: The Lyceum, a classical religious school, is challenging an ordinance in the city of South Euclid, Ohio, that would force the school to violate its beliefs about marriage and human sexuality or risk fines and jail time. The Lyceum’s faculty and students agree to live by community standards rooted in Catholic teaching. But the city is telling a distinctly religious school it can no longer peacefully live out its faith. Specifically, a city ordinance would force The Lyceum to hire teachers and enroll students who fundamentally disagree with or refuse to abide by the school’s Catholic community standards. Because of the city’s actions, The Lyceum must choose between violating the city’s ordinance—and risking fines, jail time, and closure in the process—or violating its beliefs. Likewise, parents will be blocked from passing down their faith to the next generation through a quality Catholic education if The Lyceum is shut down. Parents have a right to send their children to a school that reflects their religious values. It is wrong to banish religious schools from the marketplace of ideas simply for holding unpopular beliefs. That’s why The Lyceum is asking a federal court to stop the city from enforcing this law against it.

Key Points

- Religious schools have a right to operate consistently with their beliefs, but the city’s SOGI ordinance jeopardizes this right—and threatens to crush The Lyceum.
- Parents—not the government—have the right to decide what religious beliefs to teach their children, including beliefs about marriage and human sexuality. The city should not block parents from passing down their faith to the next generation by shutting down faith-based schools.
- The city is telling a distinctly religious school it can’t peacefully live out its faith. This government compulsion has no place in a tolerant society.
- Tolerance and respect for good-faith differences are essential in a pluralistic society like ours. They enable us to peacefully coexist with each other.

Key Facts

- The SOGI (sexual orientation and gender identity) ordinance doesn’t even include a religious exemption. In fact, the City intentionally deleted a religious exemption from the ordinance to target faith-based groups.
- Challenging unjust laws is a hallmark of civil rights litigation. For decades, people across the ideological spectrum have used pre-enforcement challenges to protect their freedoms.
- The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled twice—first in Obergefell and then again in Masterpiece—that the government must respect the belief that marriage is between one man and one woman.

The Bottom Line: Religious schools like The Lyceum should be free to operate according to their faith without fear of unjust government punishment.
